

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

A great many people devoted immense time, effort, and money over the course of many years to help me reach the point where I could have the privilege of crafting an Acknowledgements page for a dissertation. I feel immensely grateful for the different kinds of support – emotional, professional, and financial – that so many people have given to me over the course of so many years. It is no exaggeration to say that this dissertation would not have been possible without the kindness, tough love, guidance, and mentorship of the following people.

Of course, my first set of acknowledgements is to the twenty-three amazing, steadfast, courageous women who decided to participate in my research. Each of these women demonstrated immense patience with me, even at times when my interview questions seemed strange or boring to them, or reminded them of upsetting situations. I am so grateful to each of them for spending immense amounts of time with me, especially when so much of that time was focused on revisiting immensely sad periods of time in their lives. My research participants made this dissertation possible because of their clarity of thought, their willingness to critically talk about their lives, and their desire to make the world a better place for other survivors of sexual violence. While I appreciated the support of all of my coworkers at my research site, I genuinely believe that my success in fieldwork was due in large part to Agatha M.'s warm welcome and support of me, from my very first day onward. Agatha was a constant source of emotional support for me during fieldwork – she endlessly renewed my confidence in myself, recruited women for my interviews, and was always to sit and entertain me with interesting gossip. At times when the chaos of fieldwork seemed overwhelming, Agatha was always there to make me laugh or give me a shoulder to lean on.

My partner, Matthew Bauer, endured all of my graduate school adventures with me. His support nourished me in so many ways: he emotionally sustained me with his never-ending love and patience, he intellectually challenged me by listening to my angry rants and critiquing my failures in logic, and he, quite literally, nourished me through an immeasurable number of home-cooked meals to keep me healthy and focused. And, recognizing the importance of distracting me from the anxieties of this dissertation, he knew just when to lure me away from reading and writing with the promise of nature hikes or board games or Star Trek. Through all of my years of advocacy and academic endeavors, and all of my feelings of uncertainty and self-doubt, Matthew has been a steadfast pillar of support for me. There really is no way to adequately express in words my gratitude toward Matthew's support in helping me earn my PhD, other than to simply note that without him, I would not have achieved this goal.

My dear friend Carol Middlebrough started working at my fieldwork site around the same time I began official fieldwork, and although I often told her how grateful I was for her presence, I do not think she ever really understood the depths of my gratitude. Carol was a lighthouse for me in a sea of chaos – I really do not think that I would have survived fieldwork without her. Her calmness, clear sense of logic, amazing work ethic, and unfailing sense of humor helped ground me every time I felt overwhelmed by the disorder, contradictions, and confusion swirling around me during fieldwork. It was an honor to have her as a coworker, and I continue to feel honored to call her a friend.

Melissa Hackman endlessly boosted my self-esteem with her eternal optimism about my research, writing abilities, and career. Whenever I was feeling worried or upset, I knew that Melissa would immediately be there to put things into perspective, making me laugh and admit to myself that I was smart and capable of making it through to the end. Melissa was an unfailing cheerleader during fieldwork and writing, and I am eternally grateful to her for her optimism, sweetness, and practical suggestions for taking care of myself.

I am so grateful for the guidance and encouragement of Brett Williams, my wonderful, dedicated adviser. Brett gave me a great deal of independence, giving me plenty of room to create my own path, develop ideas, make mistakes, and figure out how to solve my problems on my own, in my own way. Brett's decision to give me so much intellectual freedom was a profound gift to me; her trust in my decision-making abilities boosted my self-confidence and helped me feel confident that I was capable of conducting research and writing a dissertation without micro-management. I am also grateful to Brett for her patience and kindness with me; whenever I arrogantly pushed back against her critiques or her suggestions, she sat quietly back and let me figure things out on my own – and I eventually discovered that she had been right all along.

From the first time I met her, Debarati Sen was an inspiration to me; her commitment to feminist anthropology, as demonstrated through her teaching strategies and her research endeavors, helped guide me in countless ways. She always gave me constructive feedback, challenging me to think critically and self-reflexively. Debarati also consistently showed me that she cared about my progress as a student and a scholar; she always took time out of her schedule to meet with me and inquire about my progress. She was also instrumental in helping me expand my knowledge about anthropological scholarship focusing on violence. Debarati was an invaluable committee member, and I am grateful to her for her critical feedback and insightful suggestions for this dissertation.

Catherine Mitchell Fuentes not only immediately took me under her wing and mentored me, but she also constantly inspired me with her clear commitment to feminist anthropology. I am tremendously grateful to her for always supporting me, offering help, and expressing genuine interest in my research progress, my intellectual ideas, and my emotional well-being. Her cheerful attitude and willingness to always answer my requests for help and information demonstrated her obvious commitment to helping me succeed. Catherine's dedication to working with survivors of gender-based violence and building a more peaceful future inspires me, every day, to follow in her footsteps. I am so grateful to Catherine for offering to be part of my committee; she was an integral part of my success.

From my very first semester of graduate school onward, Daniel Sayers proved himself to be a fantastic teacher and mentor. Not only did Dan provide me with in-depth guidance about how to think about, and critique, social inequalities, but he also took time to talk with me about my ideas, my concerns, and my career goals. He was a reliable, consistent source of support for me; I always knew I could turn to him for guidance about intellectual or professional endeavors, and he would give me honest, helpful feedback. Furthermore, Dan's participation as a committee member on this dissertation was essential to my success; he helped me critically think about how to expand my understanding of social inequalities.

I owe a special thank you to Sabiyha Prince, who started me off with a strong and solid foundation for developing my research project and starting fieldwork. Sabiyha's obvious commitment to public anthropology and serving her research communities inspired me, and constantly reminded me, that merely doing research is not enough – anthropologists also need to be strategic and thoughtful about how they interact with their communities, and how they disseminate their research findings. I am grateful to have had the honor of being Sabiyha's advisee.

I had the pleasure of being educated by amazing faculty members in the Department of Anthropology at Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis and I want to acknowledge two of my mentors in particular, for all of their support and guidance over the years. Jeanette Dickerson-Putman has been an incredibly important presence in my life for many years; as my teacher, my mentor, and my dear friend, she has inspired me to always be an ethical and responsible researcher. I have learned so many valuable lessons from Jeanette about research design, teaching, and professionalism, and I am honored that she has been my friend for so many years. I am also deeply indebted to Richard Ward; throughout all these years, he has always taken time out of his schedule to thoughtfully talk with me about my future and my career goals. Whenever I needed guidance, Rick was there to give me honest, critical feedback about my ideas and plans.

I also want to acknowledge the other faculty members at IUPUI who set me up for success: Susan Hyatt, Paul Mullins, Larry Zimmerman, Gina Sanchez-Gibau, and Elizabeth Kryder-Reid all provided me with a solid understanding of anthropology and what it means to work for social justice. Their careful instruction and mentorship ensured that by the time I arrived at graduate school, I would be ready and able to study anthropology in an even more in-depth manner. I appreciate all of their support over the years. I am also appreciative of all of my faculty members at American University, including Dolores Koenig, David Vine, Rachel Watkins, Sue Taylor, Bill Leap, and Adrienne Pine.

Two colleagues from St. Mary's College of Maryland were constant sources of encouragement and positivity for me during the writing phase of this dissertation. Bill Roberts continually reminded me to stay focused, and cheerfully supported me whenever I expressed feelings of doubt or uncertainty. Bill was an upbeat, positive mentor who turned out to be one of my biggest cheerleaders during my final stretch of writing. Claire Chen appeared in my life just at the time I needed a new friend and colleague; her encouragement about writing and finishing my dissertation helped keep me focused and on track. Claire was always willing to set up writing groups with me, constantly cheered me on, and inspired me with her strong work ethic. Both Bill and Claire were also incredibly supportive and optimistic of my job search, and constantly boosted my self-esteem.

I was fortunate to develop friendships during graduate school with several amazing people. Karen Lindsey was a wonderful friend throughout grad school and all of my dissertation endeavors. Not only did she provide me with intellectual stimulation, but she also kept me entertained and encouraged along the way. Rafael Lainez kept me entertained, inspired, and motivated to keep on plugging away at my goals even when our grad school workload, and fieldwork requirements, seemed completely overwhelming. Karen and Rafael provided me with years of laughter, clever critiques about academia, and above all, loving support and friendship. Not only did Anoosh Khan inspire me to become a strong feminist anthropologist, but she also gave me some very practical advice that kept me healthy: she told me to go to the gym to relieve stress from writing, and this advice turned out to be some of the best I ever received. I am appreciative to Anoosh for acknowledging the connections between mental and physical health, and for being such an inspirational friend and colleague. Julie Koppel Maldonado was a constant source of friendship for me throughout graduate school, fieldwork, and writing. She always inspired me with her ability to juggle multiple stressful priorities while still maintaining a totally positive, loving outlook on the world.

Several other classmates and colleagues supported me and inspired as well. In Chapter One, I mention how instrumental Jennie Simpson was in connecting me with my research site. However, I want to acknowledge her importance to my dissertation journey here, because she always seemed to appear at exactly the right time when I needed someone to let me vent about academia and my worries about my career choices. Jennie's clear insights and thoughtful nature inspired me and helped assure me when I was feeling doubtful about my future. Although I barely even knew her, Shelley Harshe volunteered to read my chapters – an indication of her generous, collegial nature. I deeply appreciate Shelley’s willingness to support me and help ensure my success. There were so many other classmates from American University who intellectually challenged and emotionally supported me over the past six years: I am grateful to have had the privilege of working with, talking with, and enjoying life with Tony Gualtieri, Deborah Murphy, Ashante Reese, Tamara Mihailović Mulhall, Nell Haynes, Karl Austin, Dvera Saxton, Abigail Conrad, Naomi Jagers, and Barbra Lukunka. I also want to give a shout-out to Becky Jacobson, who provided me with professional and personal support during my final months of fieldwork, and throughout the writing phase of this dissertation. Becky always provided me with amazing insights and reassurances about my research methods, and I truly appreciate her positivity and honesty.

Looking all the way back to my childhood, I want to acknowledge the profound impact that both of my parents had in laying out a path for me to eventually write a dissertation. My parents, Scott and Catlin, raised me to approach life with a love for intellectual exploration and a serious compassion for other people. My father was my earliest role model when it came to teaching me essential life lessons about choosing kindness over money; one of the most important lessons that Dad taught me was that life is about serving other people, even when that service does not result in personal financial benefit. My father had a PhD and could have financially thrived as a therapist, but instead, he decided to help low-income people who frequently could not afford to pay him. Dad taught me, through his actions and words, that the greatest joys in life come from helping other people – not from making money. My mother played an equally important role in my life because of her encouragement of my intellectual abilities. She instilled a love of reading and writing in me that made it possible for me to academically excel and eventually, reach the point where I could conduct research and write a dissertation. She also encouraged me to be extraordinarily independent and creative; she never controlled or censored my choice of reading materials, even when I was very young. Her willingness to let me read and learn about inequality, pain, and suffering when I was a young child helped me grow up with a powerful knowledge – and outrage – about injustices in the world.

My dear friend and kindred spirit, Bonnie Baker, has continually inspired me with her friendship for over a decade. Bonnie's love of reading and teaching, and her passionate embrace of life, have motivated me to become not only someone who studies gender inequalities, but also to become a teacher who is committed to helping students learn about how they can make the world a better place. Ever since I was a teenager, Bonnie has challenged me to boldly meet the world head-on, and she has had faith in my abilities to take risks and succeed. I cherish her role in my life.

I also owe a shout-out to the three wonderful women I met through the Indiana Coalition Against Sexual Assault: for more than a decade now, Anita Carpenter, Janet Brown, and Diana Moore have consistently inspired me to keep on fighting the good fight against rape culture. These three amazing women demonstrate the kind of inner strength, determination, and compassion that make the world a better place. Their struggles and sacrifices in serving survivors of sexual violence have gone largely unnoticed and unappreciated, and I want them to know how much I respect and admire them. Their service to survivors has been a constant inspiration to me.

Finally, in closing, I want to pay tribute to my childhood mentor, Donna Mattox, who died in 2013. Donna was one of my first childhood role models, and while I do not know if she identified as a feminist, I can easily say that she inspired me to become a strong feminist, and she certainly helped make me a better human being. Donna taught me, through her everyday actions and decisions, that it is not only important to be independent and strong, but in order to be a good person one must also practice respect and compassion toward all living beings.

I want to acknowledge the reality that this dissertation would not be possible without substantial financial support from American University. I am very grateful to the faculty members and administrators at American University who decided to support my graduate coursework and my dissertation research in several different ways. Without the generous financial support in the form of a teaching fellowship, several small research grants, and the Vice Provost Dissertation Fellowship, all bestowed upon me by American University, I never would have finished this dissertation – or even entered graduate school in the first place. In particular, the Vice Provost Dissertation Fellowship helped sustain me during my final phase of writing, and boosted my self-confidence. American University faculty members and administrators have shown me a very generous level of financial support, and trust in my research abilities, and I am very grateful to them. I am also very appreciative of the financial support I received from the Veteran's Administration; while I did not receive VA funding specifically because of my dissertation, support from the VA made a huge difference in my quality of life as a graduate student and dissertation researcher, and I appreciate all of the people who have worked so hard over the years to make sure that veterans and their children receive financial assistance for educational endeavors.
